BIG RAMP is pleased to announce our inaugural exhibition DEATH CARD, a curatorial collaboration with our neighbors and fellow gallerists at Information Space. Spanning both spaces (which share a party wall), the exhibition features the work of eight artists working in various types of object and image making, spilling into the two interiors with both frenetic fervor and quiet presence.

In Tarot, the Death Card signals change, transition, or transformation, indicating the end of one phase or project and the beginning of a new one. A powerful symbol, the Death Card acknowledges death, both literally and figuratively, as a significant part of the experience of life. As cultural producers, we naturally find ourselves addressing the uncertainty of changes around us, confronting the urgency of our evolving political experience, or marking the shifting of a cultural moment. To close and open these doors with the potent cocktail of excitement and fear, brings together the artists in this exhibition around our new collective endeavor.

Experiments with new materials or techniques are seen in Marcelo Daldoce's expanded drawing practice where forms are drawn and redrawn, deconstructing the stability of images to become installation. Sculptural works by Marilla Cubberley, Liisa Nelson and John Erwin Dillard give new life to materials discarded as waste, serve as vessels for alchemical concoctions, and reflect on the destruction/creation dialectic. Works that mark new projects and milestones, like Jen Brown's textiles featuring dyes made from plant life across the Kensington neighborhood and Joni Sullivan's painting finished soon before becoming a mother, are the results of putting out new roots and making new connections. Others create new works to engage our theme, such as Matt Witmer's holy water "Font," assembled from blown glass and carved particle board sourced from cheap IKEA furniture, and IAN Bosak's material shift from large-scale sculpture to pastel drawings, marking a shift towards softer and more personal attitudes of making.

As BIG RAMP builds a new space culled from the remains of an old one, we reflect on these transformations and the entropic forces of decay that present opportunities for new growth. We seek to immerse ourselves in our new surroundings as allies and members of a creative community that can be welcoming and inviting to our neighbors and comrades. As we mutually discover our goals and interests as a curatorial team, we come together knowing the uncertainty of becoming, but confident that our identity will be determined through discourse and interaction with our peers, learning, failing, and rebuilding as we go. Demonstrating the synergistic potentialities of new creative approaches and curatorial practices, we together pay tribute, perhaps indirectly, to the ever-present spectre of death and her tools of transformation that give us affirmations of life.

After receiving his BFA in Sculpture at Tyler School of Art he has pursued a career in fabrication and has become a highly successful fabricator in the Philadelphia area. Jen Brown is a multidisciplinary artist who seeks to ask and answer questions through their holistic practice of making and moving through the world. Jen depicts the beauty in sadness, and vice versa, that they connect with in the world. Their work absorbs and contains moments as a personal placemaker. Creativity, critical thinking and collaboration both challenge and reward. Integrating community, domesticity, and paid work into social practice, Jen appreciates the balance of all things within perpetuity. Jen Brown is an artist, gardener and community organizer. They have lived in Fishtown/Kensington//Philadelphia since 2009. They have worked in museums, galleries, bakeries, gardens, construction, and have assisted in countless projects. Jen is passionate about composting, curating, community, and absorbing the incredible fine art, music, theatre, and food in Philadelphia. Jen takes great joy in connecting people with resources.
